BEANPOLE THROWS A CURVE

The Lima High basketball team was grouped around Coach Kope, waiting for the word. They had lost their last game, and the last seven before that.

In truth, the Lima High basketball team hadn't won a game that season, and the members were feeling pretty despondent over the whole matter. They had tried everything. Vitamins, less television, even psychology. Beanpole Schwartz, their biggest asset (six foot six in his stocking feet), was even provided with a tall girl friend to offset any possible feelings of neurosis. This had helped him, but not the game.

Coach Kope spoke. "Men," he said in a hesitant tone, "men, we've got to improve our game. We don't have much to offer on the defensive, and we're worse on the offensive. In fact we're the worst offensive team in the high school league at this time. Now, does anyone have any suggestions as to what we can do to improve ourselves?"

A long and low silence pervaded the locker room, and naught was heard but a dripping shower. Finally, Dopey Dillew spoke up. "Coach," he said hesitantly, "if we could work it so the other teams would or could be lured away from Beanpole Schwartz, our star forward, why we could probably become the MOST offensive team in the league."

Cheers of agreement went up, and soon the whole team was speaking as one with Dopey Dillew, who really wasn't as dopey as all that.

"Well, then," the coach said, "by golly, that's what we'll do. We'll see to it that Beanpole gets the ball, right?"

"Right," the shout rang out.

"Okay, men, that's enough for tonight. Just keep in mind what I've told you," the coach said confidently. "I'll see you at practice tomorrow."

The team filed out, but Dopey remained. There was something that bothered him about what the coach had said, even though he had said it first. Dopey approached Coach Kope.

"Say, Coach," Dopey began.

"Yes, Dopey?" the coach responded.

"I was just wondering," Dopey went on.

"Yes, Dopey," the coach went on, slightly agitated.

"How are we going to get that ball to Beanpole around all that opposition?" Dopey asked.

Aggravated now, the coach spouted, "YOU,

Dopey! YOU are the key to the whole thing. I'm expecting you to learn how to (since HE didn't know, either) . . . to throw a CURVE with a basketball, and then we'll have the opposition running all over the court chasing the-uh-curves you throw. Won't that be a sensation now?"

Dopey's eyes grew wide, and he stared with slack jaw at the coach.

"Well," the coach went on, as if it wasn't such a bad idea, "you've got the largest pair of hands on the team; why NOT throw a curve with the basketball? Never say die, Dopey, never say die."

Dopey left the locker room, puzzled and staring at his hands. The coach remained there, muttering to himself, "Darn fool kids. How do I know how to get around the opposition and get the ball to Beanpole. Maybe that will keep Dopey quiet for a while, anyway!"

But Dopey was not by nature the quiet type. He went home and ate. Then he went to bed—not having said a word despite his verbose nature—thinking all the while, as he stared at his hands, the largest pair of hands on the team, and possibly the largest pair in the city. "Why not," Dopey thought to himself that night in bed. "Why NOT throw a curve around the opposition to Beanpole?"

The next morning Dopey was out of bed before the birds and went out into his backyard, where a small semblance of a basketball court was set up. He began pitching a basketball from a distance toward the basket, and the resultant rebound became a disturbing noise to sleeping Jonathan Wimple, a neighbor and classmate of Dopey's.

As Jonathan Wimple, gentlemen, scholar and brain, rubbed the sleep from his eyes in time to the blap-blap-blap of a basketball rebound, he thought dire thoughts concerning HIS next-door neighbor, Dopey Dillew.

Awake, he stuck his head out his bedroom window and spied Dopey working at the basket. "Hey, Dopey, do you have to do that at this hour of the morning? School doesn't start for another three hours. You might have some consideration, my friend."

"Oh, I'm sorry there Jonnie, old boy," Dopey said. "I didn't mean to wake anyone up. I'm trying to throw a curved basketball."

"This is no time for jokes," Jonathan said sleepily, "but I guess the team does need you practicing. We haven't won a game this year, have we?"

TV TEENS

"I'm not kidding, Jon boy," Dopey went on, "the coach said if I could learn to throw a curve with this here basketball, we'd be in. We might even win our game with Delphos High next week."

"And how would that come about due to an ability to throw a curved basketball?" Jonathan asked, and then he suddenly straightened up, bashing his head against the window frame shouting, "Why, OF COURSE it would work. That's it, Dopey, that's IT!"

Jonathan reached for his clothes, threw them on and rushed downstairs and outside to the miniature court. He had his slide rule and a science book with him.

"What you got all that stuff for, Jonnie?" Dopey asked, dribbling the basketball.

"My friend, I, Jonathan Wimple, am here to assist you in this noble and timely venture. You, with my able assistance, will become the hottest thing in Eastern basketball. Maybe even in Western, Southern and Northern basketball. I am here to show you just HOW to throw that curve with a basketball."

"You are?" Dopey asked incredulously. "How?"

"Well, now, Dopey," Jonathan went on in his best scholarly manner, "I have made a long study of Bernoulli's theories of air pressure, which have to do with the related fields of aerodynamics, as well as such things as curve balls."

"You mean you can show me how to do it, Jon boy?" Dopey asked.

"Of course I can!" Jonathan flipped open the book, zipped the slide rule a few times and spouted: "See?"

Dopey gazed at a diagram of a ball that had circular arrows spinning counter-clockwise, plus other arrows showing direction of the sphere. After a moment's speculation, he put his hand to his chin and said, "It looks good, but wouldn't the ball go in the other direction? The direction it's flipped?"

"Not according to Bernoulli, Dopey," Jonathan informed him—with no insult intended. "And that's the switch! If you throw the ball hard enough, especially a large ball like this, it will probably do a DOUBLE or 'S' curve!"

"You're making jokes!"

"Try it!" Jonathan said, tossing the ball to Dopey.

Well, Dopey did, and the ball did the craziest things! An overhead toss, and the ball, after describing an inverted arc, suddenly dipped down at the end! After a round-house throw, the ball, after curving strangely to the right instead of the left, suddenly dipped to the left again!

"Let's try throwing it around the post," Dopey yelled excitedly. Then, realizing this was all top secret, he lowered his voice: "This is the greatest contribution to the game since tall centers, Jonathan! We're made! The games are in the bag!"

With that they took their positions and proceeded to toss each other passes around the post from either side! And with ease! This most certainly was it!

The next thing, of course, was to teach it to Beanpole Schwartz. Not so much to throw it as to catch it. That is, if they could find him. The new girl friend, it seems, was as happy to find a he of her height as he was a she.

When they finally located them, in the Candy Corner, Beanpole agreed to practice it with Lena only. So, Jonathan and Dopey taught the curve to her and left somewhat reluctantly.

Their fears were baseless, however, for, on the night of the big game Beanpole was in rare shape. He could pluck the Bernoulli curve out of the air from any direction. Lena had learned well!

The trouble was, however, that the other team seemed able to offset every throw! THEY knew where the curve was going to be too! They even started using it themselves!

Well, we can't say it wasn't an exciting game—and different, as basketball games go (it looked more like basket weaving than basketball, the way the sphere sped back and forth and across the loom-er-court), but, all things being equal, and they sure were now, Lima lost again!

Coach Kope, once more back in the locker room, and with the (if you'll excuse the expression) team grouped around, tried desperately to cope with the situation.

"Men," he sighed. Then, changing his mind, "What happened, boys?"

"You got me, Coach," Dopey said. Coach Kope just looked at him.

"I mean with YOU," and the Coach pointed a fat finger at Beanpole. "We got you a girl, gave you a gimmick and you STILL gum up the works! Didn't you PRACTICE?"

Beanpole looked hurt. "Sure!" he said defensively.

"He practiced with his girl friend, Lena," Dopey offered.

"Lena!" the coach sneered. "What does SHE know about basketball?"

This was too much for Beanpole, so he played his ace. "Plenty!" he said proudly. "Her brother is the captain of the other team!"
